After Pudding deleted Reijo's memory of Big Mama's evil plan, poor Reju fainted and ended up in the infirmary with a vague memory of why she suffered a bullet wound to the leg. Of course, Pudding didn't know that Sanji was eavesdropping, and now our cook went to visit his convalescent sister and circled her on everything that just happened. What follows more memories of Sanji and Reiju's childhood, some of which is new information, but much of it is not. One of the connections that has been left in the air for fans is that of the late mother Sora shares the name with the sea hero from the famous comic book series that we were introduced to at the beginning of the arc, the one where Herma 66 and Vinsmokes were the villains. The consequences, as far as I can tell, say that the comic was loosely based on real events, and the real sea hero was a woman who fell in love with her supposed enemy and married him. The soora we meet through Sanji's memoirs has only ever been portrayed as a victim of the judge's thirst for power, but if we eventually learned of the more encouraging blow between points A and C, it would be an incredible ode to the move. New material we get this week reidhu recounting her parents' struggles was while Sora was pregnant with a quadruped, where a judge wanted to use her evil science to genetically raise babies before they were born, and Sora objected to it by drinking a toxin in an attempt to overturn the procedure. Improvements were made on three of the four boys, making them strong ruthless killers and leaving Sanji as the only one able to grow into a normal person. Obviously, we've already learned that this has made Sanji a family member and a prime target for abuse. The toxin that took Sora also made her sick, eventually killing her. We spent an excessive amount of time going back in time and dwelling on the horrible things that happened to Sanji, probably giving them a lot more screen time than some of the longer memories of the series. There is new information here, but we will probably spend even more time repeating the part of the story we already know again. The ending of this episode again tells the story of Sanji's escape, only now in the form of a montage set on pretty Luffy vs. Sanji music, almost like saying Look how far we've come! Less than halfway through the arc, which is bound to be at least 80 episodes long. It doesn't help that it's also one of those episodes fumbling over yourself to stay on the model. And then, like a cherry on top of all the dirty ice cream, all the girls' tits inexplicably drawn more than usual. The more we get into the weird things involving the Vinsmokes, their genetics, and the relationship between Judge and Sora, the more the story risks just becoming rude. A lot of talk about vague scientific magic, pregnancy, dead moms and so on. There's a clear balance you need to strike where the show doesn't lose, which is easy to digest fantastic quality, but also fleshes out Vinsmokes convincingly. Reidju seems content to know that her family will die at the wedding, believing that the whole country of Herma was just one big painful mistake, and calls on Sanji to just stand up and leave so that one good child of their mother can survive. Once again, the really important plot point in this conversation, which will tie the episode together, stays out so that they can spend more time padding. For such a dull and ugly episode, it sure got me thinking about the inner workings of this arc and its impressively complex ambitions. As the great mom's plan to eradicate Vinsmokes begins to come to fruition, the villains are the basis of the story. These are two vile, toxic, families who deserve to deserve they're about to get it, and yet we drip-fed both of their stories, even from a chronological order, implying that there will always be something new to learn. My Gut tells me that Oda is playing the game to see how nasty he can make these villains and still end up making their Allies Straw Hats by pulling a magic trick from the ultimate sympathy audience. Right now though, it's just kind of a bad time. Rating: C One Piece is currently streaming on Crunchyroll and Funimation.com.
